Castro is a self-proclaimed environmental activist who has spent decades fighting against the pollution that plagues Rio. She has led protests, organized clean-ups, and even confronted politicians about their inaction. Her tactics have often been unconventional and confrontational, earning her both praise and criticism.

The Politics of Pollution

Rio de Janeiro is one of the most polluted cities in the world. The city's air quality is often hazardous, and its waters are contaminated with sewage and industrial waste. This pollution has a devastating impact on the health of the city's residents, particularly the poor and marginalized.

The causes of Rio's pollution are complex and multifaceted. They include the city's rapid urbanization, lack of infrastructure, and reliance on fossil fuels. However, Castro argues that the root cause of the pollution is political.

"The rich and powerful have created this pollution," Castro says. "They have profited from it, while the poor and marginalized have suffered the consequences." Castro believes that the only way to solve Rio's pollution crisis is to change the political system that has created it.

Castro's Activism

Castro's activism is often controversial. She has been accused of being too confrontational, of using shock tactics to get attention, and of alienating potential allies. However, Castro argues that her tactics are necessary to raise awareness of the pollution crisis and to pressure politicians to take action.

In 2016, Castro led a protest in which she and her supporters dumped sewage on the steps of the city hall. The protest was widely condemned, but Castro argued that it was necessary to show the public the extent of the pollution problem.

In 2017, Castro was arrested after she confronted a politician about his inaction on pollution. She was charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest, but the charges were eventually dropped.

city and its residents, and she is determined to hold those responsible for the pollution crisis accountable.
